1. Objective

Our probationary period policy defines the employment probationary period and its implications for both the employee and the company. This period serves as an introductory phase during which both the employer and the employee can assess the suitability of the employment relationship and determine whether it should continue.

2. Scope

This policy applies to all prospective and existing employees of HR Magix.

3. Policy Overview

Employees who may be subject to a probationary period include newly hired individuals, current employees promoted to a higher responsibility role, and current employees placed under disciplinary review. The length of the probationary period will be mentioned in the HR Magix Job Offer Letter and may vary depending on the role. It will not exceed predefined limits. If necessary, the probation period may be extended with formal written notice detailing the reasons and expectations.

4. New Employees

Although hiring procedures are structured to recruit the best talent, we acknowledge that cultural fit and performance are not always predictable. The probation period allows the company and the new employee Time to evaluate if the role and environment are mutually beneficial. During this trial period, the employee will receive continuous feedback and coaching to support their adaptation and performance. At the end of the probation period—or earlier if deemed appropriate—the supervisor will decide whether to retain the employee based on job-related criteria, including skills, progress on assignments, dependability, and workplace relationships. These criteria will be evaluated quantitatively when possible and documented accordingly.

5. No Leave and Work-from-Home During Probation

Employees under probation are not entitled to any paid leave, except for national holidays and company-listed festival holidays. Work-from-home arrangements are not available to probationary employees under any circumstances.

6. Duration

The standard duration of the probationary period for new employees is three (3) months.

7. Permanent Employees Under Probation

Employees who have completed their initial probation and received permanent status may still be placed on probation for disciplinary reasons, such as performance issues or policy violations. The duration of such probation will vary depending on the nature of the infraction. During this time, the employee is expected to demonstrate improvement with the support of guidance, feedback, and training. Additionally, employees promoted or transferred to a new position may be placed on probation to assess their suitability for the new responsibilities.

If found unsuitable, the company may consider alternatives such as demotion or return to the previous role, but continued employment is not guaranteed and remains at management's discretion.

8. Termination During Probation

Employees may be terminated during the probation period without the need for prior notice as required for confirmed employees. Termination may occur with or without cause, depending on the evaluation results or in the event of serious misconduct. The decision will be communicated formally in writing, citing the reasons and the date of termination.

9. Salary Adjustment

If, after the end of probation or disciplinary probation, the employee's performance is found to be below expectations, salary revision may be considered in accordance with HR policies and subject to management approval.

10. Leave Entitlement Post-Probation

Employees on probation are not eligible for earned or casual leave. However, statutory leaves such as national holidays or bereavement leave may be granted as per applicable laws. After successful completion of the probation period, the employee will be credited with an additional 5 days of paid leave.
